1	2026-09-02 · 9:00 AM PT · seller strategy · frame layout The first ten days of a listing are the most valuable days it will ever have. A new listing arrives in front of every buyer already searching, and that audience never gathers in the same way twice. Attention peaks early, then quietly declines week after week. • Pricing settled before the launch, not after • Photography and preparation finished on day one • Showings concentrated while interest is highest Momentum is easier to build than to rebuild. Planning a listing this fall? Let's prepare the launch together. 2	2026-09-04 · 9:00 AM PT · buyer education · minimal layout Waiting for the perfect home carries a cost of its own. Every buyer keeps a mental list of non-negotiables, and a search stalls when that list quietly grows into a fantasy. Carrying costs continue, savings targets shift, and the homes that were nearly right find other owners. The right home fits your life, not a checklist. Feeling stuck in the search? Let's define what actually matters together. 3	2026-09-07 · 9:00 AM PT · staging & presentation · band layout Buyers feel a home before they analyze it. Staging is usually discussed in visual terms, yet the details that linger with a buyer are rarely visual at all. • Neutral air, free of cooking, pets and heavy fragrance • Quiet rooms, with music and appliances turned off • A steady temperature that invites people to linger Comfort is the first thing a buyer notices and the last thing they forget. Preparing for showings? Let's set the scene together. 4	2026-09-09 · 9:00 AM PT · seller strategy · collage layout Renovate for the block you are on. There is a ceiling on every street, and a home finished well beyond its neighbours rarely recovers the difference at resale. Buyers compare within a range, and quality above that range becomes something they enjoy rather than something they pay a premium for. Improve to the top of your market, not past it. 5	2026-09-11 · 9:00 AM PT · negotiation & strategy · frame layout The best offer is not always the highest one. Sellers weigh certainty alongside price, and a slightly lower number backed by clean terms often carries more weight than a headline figure tied to conditions. • Financing arranged and verified in advance • Dates that match the seller's own timeline • Few subjects, and none that invite renegotiation Price gets attention. Certainty gets accepted. Preparing to compete for a home? Let's build the stronger offer together. 6	2026-09-14 · 9:00 AM PT · investment & location · minimal layout In Vancouver, you are often buying the land more than the building. Assessments separate land value from improvement value for a reason, and that split shows where your money is actually going. Land holds its position in a city; a structure ages, dates, and can eventually be replaced. Buildings age. Locations compound. 7	2026-09-16 · 9:00 AM PT · seller strategy · band layout Know what the inspector will find before the buyer does. A pre-listing inspection moves discovery to the one moment when a seller still holds every option. • Repairs completed calmly, on your own schedule • Pricing that already accounts for known conditions • Fewer surprises that reopen a negotiated deal Information you control is leverage. Information they discover is a discount. Thinking about listing this fall? Let's get ahead of the report together. 8	2026-09-18 · 9:00 AM PT · buyer education · collage layout The purchase price is not the final cost. Buyers budget carefully for the down payment, then meet a second set of numbers at the closing table. • Property transfer tax and legal fees • Adjustments, insurance and inspection costs • Moving, utilities and the first round of repairs Budget for the whole transaction, not only the price. Building your buying budget? Let's map every cost together. 9	2026-09-21 · 9:00 AM PT · investment & location · frame layout A second suite changes the math on a property. Laneway homes and legal suites turn a single dwelling into a property with two purposes, whether that means rental income, room for family, or flexibility as needs change. Zoning, lot dimensions and lane access all determine what is genuinely possible. Buy the potential, then confirm it before you count on it. 10	2026-09-23 · 9:00 AM PT · seller strategy · minimal layout Kitchens sell homes, and rarely because of a full renovation. The updates that move a buyer are usually modest, visible, and finished long before the first showing. • Hardware, lighting and taps brought up to date • Paint that refreshes cabinets rather than replaces them • Counters cleared to two or three considered objects Small, deliberate updates outperform expensive ones. Wondering what is worth doing before listing? Let's prioritise the work together. 11	2026-09-25 · 9:00 AM PT · negotiation & strategy · band layout Your deposit is a statement of intent. Sellers read a deposit as a measure of commitment, because it is the part of an offer that carries real consequence for the buyer. A larger deposit signals preparation and financial readiness in a way that price alone cannot. Terms speak before the price does. Structuring an offer this season? Let's make every term work together. 12	2026-09-28 · 9:00 AM PT · luxury positioning · collage layout Fewer showings, better buyers. At the upper end of the market, exposure is not the same as marketing. A private, well-prepared showing gives a serious buyer the time and the quiet to imagine ownership, which a crowded open house rarely allows. Discretion is a service, not a limitation. Considering a discreet sale? Let's design the process together. 13	2026-09-30 · 9:00 AM PT · investment & location · frame layout A view is only yours if something protects it. Protected view corridors, height limits and the development potential of neighbouring lots decide whether an outlook lasts a decade or a season. • Zoning and height limits on adjacent lots • Designated view corridors written into city policy • Development applications already in progress Confirm the view. Never assume it. Paying a premium for an outlook? Let's verify what protects it together.
