Pricing, preparation and presentation have to work together. 2	YOUR POST Fri Oct 23 · 9:00 AM · Your post · Single image Your post, as supplied. More choice gives Vancouver buyers room to compare carefully, negotiate thoughtfully and make decisions with greater confidence. That means looking beyond list price to condition, monthly costs, location, future resale and the seller's position. The advantage is not simply having more listings. It is having the time and context to recognize the right opportunity. 3	YOUR POST Mon Oct 26 · 9:00 AM · Your post · Single image Your post, as supplied. The best preparation is selective, not expensive for the sake of it. A few well-chosen repairs, better lighting, edited furniture and thoughtful staging can help Vancouver buyers understand a home more quickly. We focus on what will shape their impression and skip work unlikely to change the result. Buying first gives you more control over where you are going, but creates more financial exposure. Selling first gives you budget certainty, but may leave less flexibility for your next purchase.

The right order depends on your financing, current home, housing needs and tolerance for uncertainty.

An offer is a package, not a single number.

Price matters, but so do the deposit, conditions, completion and possession dates, and the buyer's ability to complete. The strongest offer delivers the best overall result with risk you understand.

A first home, an offer in a busy situation and a move-in within a month of the listing.

Thank you, Joséphine, for sharing your experience. Buying your first home should feel this way: clear advice on the offer, and help from start to finish.

A condo's finishes tell you about the unit. The strata documents tell you about the building.

Before buying in Vancouver, review the Form B, budget, contingency reserve fund, depreciation report, minutes, insurance, planned work and potential special levies. You are buying the home and a share of the building's future.

Riley Park, where our office sits on Main Street, is at its best on a Saturday.

Until March 27, the Riley Park Winter Farmers Market runs on Saturdays from 10am to 2pm at 30th Avenue and Ontario Street, with more than 85 farms and producers. A few blocks west, Queen Elizabeth Park sits on Little Mountain with views across the city to the North Shore.

If you are curious about homes in the area, we are just down the street.

The best time to see how a home handles water is while it is raining.

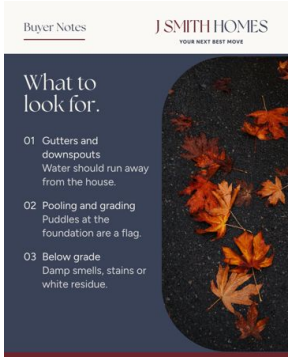

Watch where the gutters and downspouts send water, whether it pools against the foundation, and how the basement looks and smells. In older Vancouver homes, it is also worth asking when the perimeter drains were last inspected or replaced. A camera inspection costs far less than a drainage repair.

Rain shows what sunny listing photos cannot.

A home's entry works hardest from November to March.

In Vancouver's wet season, the first few metres inside the door take the most wear. A covered landing, a bench and hooks for coats and boots, a good mat and flooring that shrugs off water keep the rest of the home calm and clean.

It is also the first space a buyer sees on a rainy showing day.

Listing in November and December has its own rhythm.

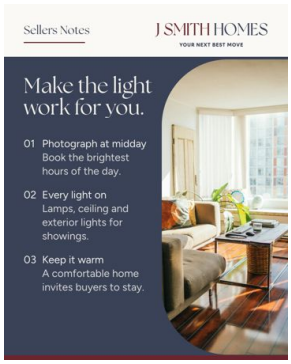

With the shortest days of the year approaching, photography is best booked for the brightest part of the day, and every showing should have the lamps, ceiling lights and exterior lights on. Buyers who are out looking in the rain are usually serious, and a warm, well-lit home gives them a reason to stay.

Our process includes complimentary home staging, which takes care of these details before the first photo.

17	Fri Nov 27 · 9:00 AM · Buyer Notes · Carousel, 2 slides Three ages matter more than most of the feature list. The roof, the heating system and the hot water tank each have a predictable service life and a predictable replacement cost. Knowing where each one sits turns a vague worry into a number you can plan around, and sometimes into a point worth raising before subjects are removed. Ask for the ages, then ask for the paperwork that confirms them. 18	Mon Nov 30 · 9:00 AM · Sellers Notes · Single image A buyer forms an opinion before reaching the front door. The walk from the sidewalk sets the tone for everything after it. Trimmed edges, a swept path, exterior lights that all work and a front door that opens smoothly suggest the rest of the home has been cared for too. In the wet months, add a clean mat and a dry place for umbrellas. Small exterior details are some of the least expensive improvements a seller can make.
